One of the most notorious French films of the 1960's (if not all of cinema) is a bonafide art-house masterpiece. Under the mask of a sly and witty, glamorous social satire lurks a completely perverse and deeply complex psychological character study (a motif used heavily in the film).

In the days after I first saw Stanley Kubrick's "Eyes Wide Shut," another film entered my mind again and again. It was Luis Bunuel's "Belle de Jour" (1967), the story of a respectable young wife who secretly works in a brothel one or two afternoons a week. Actors sometimes create "back stories" for their characters -- things they know about them that we don't.

I picked up the novella for Belle De Jour after watching the 1967 Catherine Deneuve film adaptation for the hundredth time. The book is a novella so it's not as long as it perhaps could have been but it is definitely fuller bodied and more fulfilling experience then the movie is.

Belle de jour. Catherine Deneuve’s porcelain perfection hides a cracked interior in one of the actress’s most iconic roles: Séverine, a Paris housewife who begins secretly spending her afternoon hours working in a bordello. This surreal and erotic late-sixties daydream from provocateur for the ages Luis Buñuel is an examination of desire and fetishistic pleasure (its characters’ and its viewers’), as well as a gently absurdist take on contemporary social mores and class divisions.
