4.0 out of 5 stars Paul Rudolph: The Florida Houses. Reviewed in the United States on June 14, 2002. As the Case Study program got under way in southern California, Rudolph launched his own from his office in Sarasota on Florida's Gulf coast. For two decades (with time off for U.S. Navy service) he created (first with Ralph Twitchell and then independently) a succession of airy pavilions that mitigated the steamy heat and filtered the brilliant light.

Paul Rudolph (architect) - Wikipedia

Lamolithic house was the term given by Sarasota concrete businessman John Lambie to describe his unique method of building modern reinforced concrete residential structures. This building technique enabled the fabrication of thin ceiling and wall planes, thus enabling architects to draft efficient and lightweight designs. Several historic lamolithic houses were constructed by renowned architects Paul Rudolph and Ralph Twitchell on Siesta Key, Florida using this technique. These homes were among
