To some historians of philosophy, the Hellenistic Age, with its Roman extension, suffers from other sins. Thus, we might notice that historian Will Durant (1885-1981), in his classic The Story of Philosophy [1926, 1927, 1933, 1954, 1955, 1961], has written chapters that jump directly from Aristotle to Francis Bacon. The operative principle is clearly that of the primacy of science, even though both Aristotle and Bacon contributed almost nothing to the actual progress of modern science ...
